Associate in Web Development

An Associate of Arts (AA) in Information Technology (IT)- Web Design not only allows the student to complete their general study requirements, but also offers the student lower division courses that will prepare them to becoming an IT.

Students can expect to take courses dealing with programming, business ethics, information systems, technology, and web page design. These classes will prepare the student to enter the IT industry in an entry-level position working with visual and digital design to bring a product many miles away to a customer base. The web designer is the visual conduit between consumers and businesses. The primary tasks graduates can expect to have in the workforce are creating a visually appealing and fully functional link between businesses and the customers they serve.Like most AA degrees, perhaps the most beneficial aspect it offers is the background it gives the student for future studies. With an AA in Information Technology- Web Design, students will be well prepared to continue their education with a bachelor in a similar area and beyond. With a bachelor or combination of AA and experience, graduates generally possess the credentials required to work for companies who wish for the graduate to present their products electronically to potential customers using a variety of layouts, images, textures, and applications.This major will prepare you for:With an AA in Information Technology- Web Design most students will have sufficient schooling for an entry-level position working on a variety of IT, systems programming, networking, and web page design issues for many companies. Like almost all other AA degrees, the student will be even better suited to enter the workforce with a bachelor degree or higher. The AA in Web Design lays the groundwork that will make a bachelor degree in a similar field much easier for the student to accomplish. By the end of their AA students should expect to understand the basics of computer networking, business administration, and systems programming, as well as being able to bring a product electronically to customers in an appealing way. This degree can also be a good foundation for students who wish to begin their own web design studio.
